History of the Ontario Horticultural Association

The Ontario Horticultural Association has existed for almost 100 years.

The first horticultural society in Ontario is officially recognized as one in Toronto, organized on May 4, 1834. Several societies across the province have been in existence for more than 100 years. Currently there are more than 280 societies with over 40,000 members.

For many years all societies were part of the Agricultural Association but toward the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century there was a move to form a separate organization. Prior to the formal organization, some preliminary meetings had been held in 1904 and 1905. The idea became a reality when the Ontario Horticultural Association was formed on Nov. 9, 1906. The annual meetings (conventions) have been held regularly since then.

In the early years the conventions were held in Toronto. More recently they have been held in different locations around the province with one or more districts serving in the capacity as host. Each year the association publishes an annual report which highlights the activities of its member societies.

The association and its member societies played a prominent role in having the trillium grandiflorum (white) adopted as the floral emblem of the Province of Ontario and have long encouraged tree planting as well as the promotion of horticultural education among the youth in the province.

In 1967, to honour Canada's Centennial, the association distributed 1,000 Royalty crabapple trees.

In 2006 the Ontario Horticultural Association will celebrate its own Centennial – having kept the province's large and small municipalities beautiful for 100 years!
